

Conversations With Myself: A Most Common Dialogue

The only way to get to heaven is by realizing that you're already there.

It's so common that it has a name: private speech. Some scientists devote their entire careers to the phenomenon. Most research on private speech shows that we are far more brutal in our minds than in reality. When you talk to yourself, are you nicer? Meaner? Here are some of the most common bad habits:

- Before I knew it, I had begun a conversation. . . and I was not writing so much as taking dictation. Often the answers came faster than I could write, and I found myself scribbling to my most common form of communication is through feeling.
- What you tell yourself or your self talk has a profound impact on your life. In fact, our internal dialogue—the conversation we have with ourselves—is at the rate of 1300 words per minute.
- The most common practice is to use positive affirmations. Learn to calm down this endless inner conversation that goes on in the mind. You envision yourself talking angrily, shouting, and saying not so nice things. When the emotions are also evoked, more power, energy and attachment are actually triggered.
