Art, Guns and Fish for Sale The Metaphor Author: Thomas Edward Shaw

Novella: $1.99

Thomas Eddie Shaw spent many years as a musician: bass guitar player for the Monks in Hamburg, Germany during the 1960s; alleged by Rolling Stone Magazine and other media to be the precursor of the first punk groups. His chronicle, Black Monk Time, was heralded as an extraordinary memoir by Billboard Magazine. Shaws writing is a joy, said Rick Karr, of National Public Radio. Shaw is also the author of A Cowboy Like Me (short stories) and Beltramis River (historical novel).

OVERVIEW: Something is bothering Charlie. When asked to define himself, he answers, I distort easily, like a figure in a Picasso painting. He is angry, judgmental and fearful of old age and failure. Recently, when watching a modern-day version of a Shakespearian play, Charlie relates to the character who wears hubcaps as armor. His girlfriend, Karen, sums him up, Charlie, youre ranting again. Charlies rant is his armor. He tries to make sense of the world and Karen will set him straight. She is more grounded in reality; practical and sensible. Karen can fit in anywhere. Charlie fits in nowhere. He desperately wants a new life. His family background gave him an over-zealous exposure to organized religion, even as his own search for truth leads him to embrace Native American culture and spirituality. He wants to be recognized for his art without (cheaply, as some artists do) employing gimmicks. Charlie is a beat poet, stuck in the wrong century. He disdains social conformity as he tries to make it in a middle-class world that does not welcome his disdain. He questions existing norms and respects the intelligence of experimentation. He refuses to listen to music that he has heard before. Charlie may not be able to stand the truth. Shaws writing continues to be a joy. Fans of his work will welcome this intriguing novella about a character who is colorful, humorous, and most of all, human.
