Thinking Therapeutically provides a rare insight into the world of two experienced therapists as they recall their own enlightening journeys to becoming therapists. Tom Barber and Sandra Westland offer a number of verbatim accounts of their most memorable hypnotherapy sessions, along with a personal processing of each session and, more importantly, a critical analysis of each others work. Therapists are often presented with numerous theories, approaches and techniques that they have been told will be helpful for their clients, but without any specific guidance as to whether one theory will work for one client and one will not. This book provides an opportunity to see these ideas in action and gives some essential critique as to what did and what did not work in the sessions described. The authors offer us insight and guidance into the world of creativity which will open us up when we engage with clients within their own paradigms. Tom and Sandra bring their own personal touch to this book, never before seen with this degree of honesty and transparency. In sharing their work they provide both new and experienced therapists with unique insights that only the seasoned practitioner can possess.
